I am a Professor of Economics at James Madison University. My research interests include macroeconomics, economic development, and behavioral economics, with a strong emphasis on quantitative economic analysis. I employ both structural estimation and econometric methods for time series as well as cross-sectional/panel data for households and firms. In addition, I have experience in primary data management for lab and field experiments. Some of my recent work is on cyclicity of durable goods spending, international housing price cycles, China's economic policy and housing price dynamics, comovement of sovereign bond yields for OECD countries, estimation of aggregate consumption function, inflation targeting and monetary policy transmission in emerging economies, bank lending and local economy, intergenerational transmission of preferences, and intergenerational education mobility.
